Could Growth publish your activation number?

Give a colleague the data, your approved definition and the instructions. Keep your own calculation out of their chat. If they get the same count, ask whether they would also sign the same caption.

Make the reviewed answer inheritable

A receipt stores inputs, checks, review state and next action. Keep it in the repo so the next teammate or agent can recover the review after the chat ends.

Inputs	Checks	Review state	Next action

saved_path	reopen_if
points to the work a subsequent run can reuse.	names a change, such as drift in tags or totals, that invalidates the saved path.

Keep the evidence a second person needs to trust or reopen the decision. Private reasoning does not belong in the receipt.

Which week was ‘last period’?

Open the CSV. You’ll find ‘before’ and ‘after’. Can you put dates on either one? Write a caption Growth could publish and say which accounts had seven days to activate.

Write the receipt before you hand it over

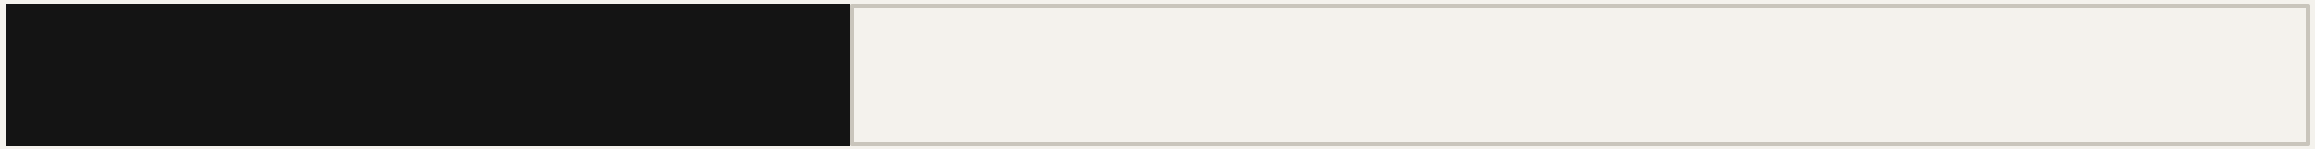

Source: the supplied after-period extract. Population: eligible accounts with the full follow-up window. Calculation: sum activated, sum eligible, then divide. Claim: the activated share of eligible accounts. Before Growth puts a calendar week in the headline, ask who can confirm the dates.

Give your colleague three files

Share activation.csv, model.json and workflow.md. Keep proof.md to yourself until the second analyst writes down the result. A clean conversation works for solo practice.

Compare the two answers

370 of 1,000

Did your colleague count 370 of 1,000 eligible accounts? If the results differ, compare source, period and denominator. Change the workflow where the two analysts had to guess.

Same answer. Enough proof?

Can your partner independently reproduce the numerator and denominator? Can they also establish the dates? Start with the analyst brief. After you write the caption you'd publish, ask Product Data for its source receipt. Which words can you add now?
